JIM CONLEY'S CASE IS ONCE MORE DELAYED

Jim Conley's case did not come up before Judge Ben Hill in the criminal division of the superior court Thursday.

On request of Solicitor General Dorsey, who bowed to the wishes of the judge, the case was left on the docket to be tried at some future date, as yet unnamed.

William Smith, attorney for the negro, was in court during the morning session, but refused to discuss his client's case in any manner save to remark that he "would press the matter to early trial, if possible."

It is not now believed the factory sweeper, whose testimony was largely responsible for the conviction of Leo Frank, on a charge of having murdered Mary Phagan, will be brought into court until after the Frank case has been disposed of before the supreme court of the state.
